Endoscopic procedures for treating pathological conditions of the bowel and/or intestinal tract are increasing in number. Endoscopes such as colonoscopes, sigmoidoscopes, small bowel enteroscopes, and others may be used to view the intestinal tract. Additional devices such as flexible sigmoidoscopes may be used to sample tissue from the lower portions of the small intestine. Procedures involving the use of endoscopes to view the intestinal tract and/or sample tissue from the lower portions of the intestinal tract are often conducted under a general anesthetic. General anesthesia may be used for this reason: a) to ensure that the patient is not experiencing extreme pain; b) to guarantee that the patient remains still during the treatment procedure; c) to assure the patient's full cooperation; and d) to encourage patient confidence in the procedure. A general anesthetic may be administered using any one of several different techniques. One of these techniques is the slow injection of the general anesthetic, or agent, into the peritoneum or subcutaneous tissue. During a slow injection anesthetic, a narrow intravenous cannula is used to inject the agent directly into the subcutaneous tissue or serous membrane. This technique is often used for deep tissue anesthesia and regional anesthesia. The agent is distributed over a large area, requiring a very small dose to achieve the desired result. The cannula is left in place for a period of time before being removed. The clinician frequently requires a small amount of the agent to be injected, so as to have a small reservoir of the agent available, and then may need to inject the remaining agent at a later time. While injecting the remaining agent, the clinician is relatively "unprotected". As a result, there is a risk of the clinician being injected with the agent. Even if the clinician does not take precautions, there is the risk that the agent may unintentionally be injected into one of the clinician's hands, arms, or other parts
